Get Shot at Computer

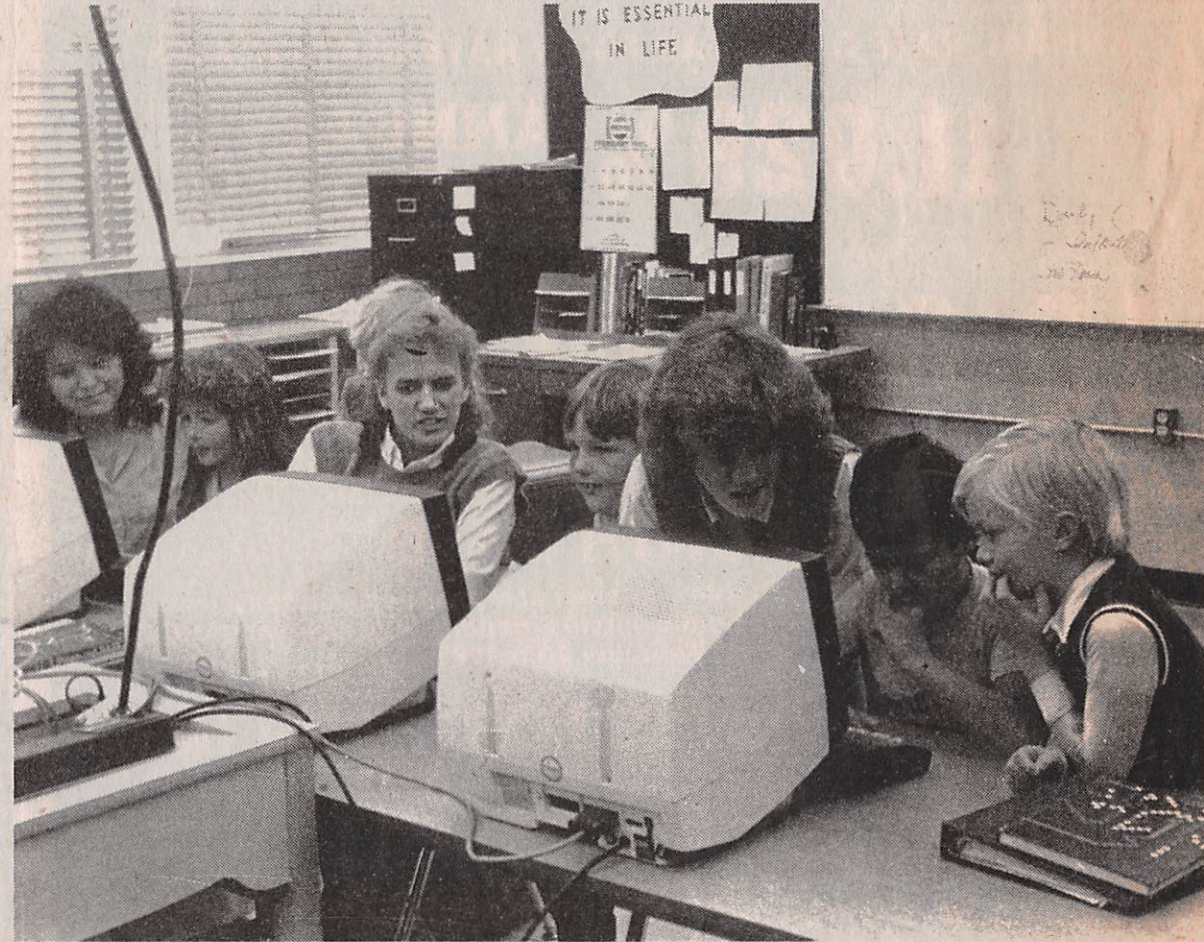

Wasatch High School (LRJ) On Feb. 19, First and Second Grade students from Central Elementary School "proved" the computer programs written by high school students at Wasatch.

The classes of Mesdames Cummings, Morgan, VanWagoner, Nelson and Holmes attended Mrs. Sherry Horner's Data Processing Classes and gave her students a chance to work out their math programs with real subjects.

"It is very interesting to see high school students kneel down by a younger student and their machines to help them through the stages of their math tutorial programs," said Mrs. Horner. The 6-7 year olds will prove if the program can be understood and followed by someone besides their originators. The primary school children should be able to learn addition and subtraction from the various programs. The individual programs, written by the high school students, will be tested throughout the day by some 140 youngsters.

A previous introduction to computer programs was made earlier in the school year to another group of 3rd and 4th graders who tested out programs in social studies. The twenty machines using Basic Language, proved their worth then-just as they will prove the abilities of students to use them now.

High school computer students look on as elementary children try their hardest at figuring out the computer problems designed for them to compute.
